Not illustrated. 1897 Excerpt: .the same time returning to the charge with such alacrity that Frascuelo was put to it to escape those sharp and wide-spread horns. The people became tired of this futile by-play, and signified their disapprobation by loud cries of: At him, Frascuelo! Give it to him; we want to go home. This made the espada slightly nervous, and he made a thrust when not fully prepared, only slightly wounding the bull, which charged upon and knocked him down, but passed completely over him in the impetus of his rush. He returned at once to gore him, and I certainly thought my quondam adversary was about to receive his last reward; but the capeadores were upon the bull immediately, and succeeded in diverting his attention until the man had scrambled to his feet. This was humiliating, and there was a look in Frascuelo s face that told of his determination to kill or be killed, at the very next charge. As he received the sword from an attendant, he wiped it on his capa, scowled fiercely at the bull as he approached, and set himself to his task. Not a movement was made that was not necessary to the final denouement; the banner waved in front of the bull, he charged, received the thrust in the neck at the branching of the horns, reeled, braced himself a moment, and fell. The sword had passed completely through the neck, the point appearing at the dewlap; a stream of...
