THE TRAITOR Book I--The Crime CHAPTER I THE THREAT WHAS the mather with the latch! John Graham stood in the soft Southern moonlight fumbling over the gate of the old homestead from which the Civil War had driven his family penniless. Used to be a latch anyhow, before his illustrious Dishonour, the Judge, and his African Government, turned us out! he continued to mutter. Wonder if hes locked it Didnt need bolts for gates in our time--but he does--the old Scalawag! Each word of the last sentence was slowly hissed. Again he felt over the gate, tried both sides without success, stepped back and surveyed it critically. By Geeminy, the gates grown up!--used to be here--see the gravel walk on the other side. He shook it gently. No mistake about it--grown solid to the fence. Ill have to climb over. He touched the points of the sharp pickets, suddenly straightened himself with dignity and growled: I wont climb over my own fence, and I wont scratch under. Ill walk straight through. A vicious lurch against the gate smashed the latch and he fell heavily inside. He had scarcely touched the ground when a fair girl of eighteen, dressed in spotless white, reached the gate, running breathlessly, darted inside, seized his arm and helped him to his feet. Mr. John, you must come home with me, she said eagerly. Got to see old Butler, Miss Susie. Youre in no condition to see Judge Butler. She...
